Calling for papers for a themed edition on
'Radical Recordkeeping' in November 2017

Archives and Manuscripts is inviting submissions of up to 5000 words for a themed edition on RADICAL RECORDKEEPING for publication in November 2017.

We are hoping that this call elicits submissions that come from persons with varied experiences, organisations, and time in the field. We realise that this call is broadly conceived.

Not sure if your idea or paper fits with the theme? Please reach out to the guest editors and we would be happy to discuss!

Aims and Scope

The concept of radical recordkeeping is broad in scope: it can encompass recordkeeping of radical acts, as well as radical approaches for the formation and use of records and archives. Radical recordkeeping serves to disrupt traditional recordkeeping paradigms in revolutionary or profound ways using different approaches that inform practice, scholarship and teaching.

Radical, by the Oxford Dictionary definition is:

1. Especially of change or action relating to or affecting the fundamental nature of something;
2. Characterised by departure from tradition; innovative or progressive.

Archives and Manuscripts is the leading peer-reviewed archival journal published in the Australasian region and has been published continuously since 1955. Over the past 60 years, Archives and Manuscripts has published hundreds of articles by archival and recordkeeping academics, researchers, practitioners, students and theorists.

Emerging Writers Award

If you are an emerging writer, another benefit of submitting your article to Archives and Manuscripts is that you will be eligible to win the journal's annual Emerging Writers Award (value AUD $1000). To be eligible to win this award, authors must have their article accepted for publication in the peer-reviewed section of the journal and be an emerging writer who:

- is currently enrolled in a graduate program or within 3 years after the date of graduation, and/or
- has previously published fewer than 5 peer-reviewed articles in an archives/recordkeeping journal.

Further information

Further information, including guidelines and style requirements for prospective authors and submission deadlines, is available on the journal's webpage at www.tandfonline.com/raam or by contacting the General Editor, Sebastian Gurciullo at journaleditor@archivists.org.au
